Helen,

Following on from Rachel's advice. My view is we hold the line on the social work file. If we produce it now we set a precedent for every family court matter that comes through the unit, and I do not think the ward has the capacity to manage the fallout with either parent.

Two options as I see them:

- (a) Produce the clinical record only and object to paragraph 3. Rachel prefers this and I agree.
- (b) Produce everything with the notifier's details removed. I think this is worse · the surrounding detail identifies them anyway, and we would have given up the objection for nothing.

Neither option is comfortable. Option (a) will read as obstructive to the mother, who has already complained twice about delays.

Separately, and this is the part I am least sure about: Thomas is twelve now and has started asking direct questions on the ward about why he sees his father less. If any of this material were to reach him directly rather than through his treating team, I would expect it to be distressing and possibly harmful to his engagement with treatment. Worth flagging if he ever requests the file himself.
